Once you have the workspace set up you can navigate using the gray brush icons. Within the new workspace there is a toggle switch and a slider. The slider lets you choose between affecting the subject or the camera and the abandoned area of the subject. For example, if you have already posed the subject and you want to change its facial expression, you can adjust it within the Neural Filters workspace. The slider allows you to apply the filter to the entire marquee or to a small region around the subject. However, the default setting is to affect all areas. Finally, after you've played with the filters for a few moments, you can go back to your image and adjust the settings on the Layer Panel. From here you access the Advanced options to fine-tune the filters. In addition to AI powered filters, Adobe has brought new adjustments to the Layer Panel. All of the adjustments are accessible to you right when you view your image in the traditional view. These include Multiply, Screen, Vanish, Soft Light, Dodge, Burn, Sharpen, Noise Reduction and Saturation. Photoshop has also introduced several new interactive adjustment layers, including the new Magnetic Layers. These layers allow you to apply adjustments to an entire layer. In older versions of Photoshop, the Paint Tool behaves differently - you use it to create canvas text. This use of the Paint Tool hasn't changed in CS5. However, with the release of CS6, Photoshop is adding a dedicated "Paint" tool set. For example, the Paint Tool now adds new cosmetic attributes that add effects like highlights, glows and strokes.
